

TOURNAMENT CLOSED WITH MONKEY SHOW

Secretary Sellers Made Hit
With Spectators by Giving Money Back.

PLAYERS WALKED HOME IN RAIN

The base ball tournament of the twenty-fifth New Mexico territorial fair closed yesterday with a brace of farce games. Las Vegas and Clifton took part in one, the game which was supposed to decide which should receive first money and which should take second, and El Paso and Trinidad took part in the second game. The championship game came first, and it was a case where the main event was pulled off before the preliminary, and both were rotten, parlor the expression. The first especially smacked of a farce game, and the second was a game of tag for gate receipts. The fans that paid on that Sunday did not get their money's worth any more than those who did not ask for their fifty cents yesterday.

The trouble began brewing Saturday morning when Las Vegas defeated Trinidad, tying Clifton for first and second place. Saturday night, it seems, these teams wanted to cut the money, without playing the tournament off. If the precedent of two years ago had anything to do with it, they had this right, but the fair association, believing that the people would like to see the tie played off, decided differently.

Trinidad and El Paso had also tied for third money and it was arranged that they should play that tie off yesterday, too, which was done good grace.

There was a dispute about the division of the gate receipts. One report is that the fair association wanted to divide the money into five ways, each team taking 20 per cent and the association taking the rest. Another is that Clifton and Las Vegas wanted 80 per cent net expenses. If this deal should have gone through, Trinidad and El Paso would surely have had a kick coming. So many stories were about about the really did happen that the real truth is only problematical, but it is thought that Las Vegas and Clifton were to get 50 per cent of the receipts, net the expenses of all four teams, and they all went into the field with this understanding. And it is believed that they started with the purpose of playing ball, but discouraged by a bad beginning, the Clifton bunch showed the "yellow," and laid down. Las Vegas made four runs in the first inning and seven in the second. Chief Myers threw the ball into center field, while three Blues ambled home and nobody seemed to care on the side of the Miners. They were all rotten, excepting Sears on first base. Sears made the most spectacular catch of the tournament in this game. Charles Daniels was particularly rotten, and Smiley Williams muffed one, but it might not have been mentioned. Well, they dubbed through the nine innings as quickly as possible. Many buckets of beer were carried in front of the grand stand over to the players' stands. The beer quickly evaporated, and it wasn't a very dry day either.

At the close of the second inning Secretary Sellers appeared before the grand stand and told the people that he believed that they were being humbugged by a farce game of base ball, and all of those who wanted their money back could get it at the ticket office. The 300 people present eagerly accepted the invitation. The majority of them liked back to New Town, while a few returned to the grand stand to see two teams of ball players make monkeys of themselves. After monkey stunts, they walked home in the rain.

The Clifton-Las Vegas game resulted in a score of 13 to 7, in favor of Las Vegas, and the Trinidad-El Paso game went to El Paso by a score of 9 to 7.

HIS AWFUL DEED ON THE BANKS OF THE LESSER SLAVE LAKE

EVIDENCE SECURED BY INDIANS WHO FLOCKED TO COURT AND GAVE TESTIMONY—BROTHER OF VICTIM IN ENGLAND SAW THE CRIME COMMITTED IN A VISION AND IDENTIFIED MURDERER.

Fort Saskatchewan, Can., Sept. 25.—On September 20th, Chas. King of Salt Lake City, Utah, will die on the scaffold for the murder of Edward Hayward.

The hanging of King will conclude one of the most interesting and, at the same time, bloodthirsty cases ever recorded in the annals of the Canadian northwest.

In August, 1904, King arrived in Edmonton. He wanted a companion to go with him to the far north and there to prospect for some of the wealth of which the Indians had brought down such fabulous tales.

Edward Hayward, a young Englishman, who had come out to this country to make a fortune for himself and a faithful girl in far off England, who was waiting his success, heard that King was looking for a partner and at once the preliminaries for the journey were arranged. They covered the 300 miles to the southern shores of Lesser Slave lake by the middle of September.

They camped in a bunch of willows on the edge of Sucker Creek Indian reserve. Sikachee, a Sucker Creek Indian, who had been trapping, noticed the tracks of two white men, and wondered what they could be doing so far from civilization. Sikachee told Sergeant Anderson, of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, who was patrolling that district. Kisanis, another Indian, watched King cooking Hayward's last supper. On the night of September 18th he heard the crack of a rifle shortly after midnight, and believing that the men must have been attacked by some wild animal, went early in the morning to investigate. He found the camp deserted but saw the tracks of only one man leaving it. The camp fire had been enlarged since he last saw it, the pile of still glowing embers being fully twelve feet long and half as wide. This struck Kisanis as being peculiar, for the weather was still warm and he could not see the necessity for so large a fire. These observations he also told to Sergeant Anderson, and then traced the footprints of the lone man to a trapper's cabin, several miles off, on the way toward Edmonton, to which town King had already started to return. When asked as to the whereabouts of the missing man, his answers were far from satisfactory, so Sergeant Anderson arrested him.

Jack Moostoo, son of Chief Moostoo, searched the camp fire. The ashes were still glowing and on the surface appeared to be the remains of some garment. He found a charred button, which fell to pieces in his hand. Telling his father and other Indians, the investigation started in earnest. In the camp fire the Indians found pieces of bone and flesh, a gold-filled tooth, some shot and a piece of a broken tent needle. In a slough, which was drained, were found two pairs of boots and the sole of another.

On King's person were found many articles that had once belonged to Hayward. This was the foundation on which the police had to work. They sent to North Mundham, England, for Henry Hayward, a brother of the murdered man, and he identified many of the articles found on King and in the fire, proving beyond a doubt that it was his brother who had been killed. The pieces of bone and bone found in the fire were sent down to Toronto for analysis, and the report came back that they were portions of a human being.

King was tried twice and each time convicted and sentenced to be hanged. Indian witnesses to the number of sixty came hundreds of miles to testify.

One of the peculiar incidents in connection with the crime was told in dispatches from England which stated that on the morning of September 19th, the morning after the murder, Henry Hayward told his sister that during the night he had had a fearful dream. In his vision he saw his brother Edward shot and the body thrown into a huge fire.

In the corner of the Fort Saskatchewan police barracks the body of Murderer King will be interred, and over the little mound will be placed a wooden slab bearing the simple inscription: "Chas. King, September 30, 1905."

Away on the shores of Lesser Slave Lake, 1,500 miles to the north of the international boundary, amid a grove of willows, there is a spot which is shunned by the Indians as unwholesome ground.

HANLEY, OF INDIANA, A GOVERNOR WHO GOVERNS

CRUCIFIED HIS OWN PERSONAL FRIEND BECAUSE OF HIS DUTY TO THE PEOPLE.

Indianapolis, Ind., Sept. 25.—"The law of Indiana was violated by the auditor of state, David Sherrick, the incumbent, has for years been my personal friend, but if my own brother had been auditor, my action would have been the same. If the time ever comes when my personal friendships or interests are to stand in the way of my doing my full duty by the people who have honored me by voting me into the highest office in their power, then I will be ready to relinquish the governorship."

That sentiment, spoken in the office of the republican governor of Indiana, by J. Frank Hanly, is typical of the man and his character.

His action in compelling Auditor Sherrick's resignation, and publishing to the world that official's inability to make good the state funds entrusted to his keeping, has met with a great wave of condemnation from "old guard" republicans.

Hanly knew, as well as anyone, David Sherrick's popularity. He knew of his own knowledge, because for many years they have been friends.

But "the law of the state of Indiana had been violated; and though it was like hitting my own brother a death blow, I had to do my duty—it mattered not whether it meant Sherrick's ruin and mine, too—I have been put here to enforce the law, and enforce the law I shall."

"Even in the best regulated families you have to clean house once in a while," added the governor. "And I am determined that this house shall be cleaned, no matter whom it hurts, and kept clean while I am governor. I guess at that there are a good many folks that wish I would govern a little less and sleep a little more."

"They say I ought to have waited on Sherrick a little while longer; that in twenty-four hours more he would have made good what he owed the state," continued the governor.

"But ten days before I acted he promised to square the matter and didn't, and when I saw the list of securities he had, I was confident he could never have realized on them. Of course, his friends might have come to his aid, but that would have not exonerated him. He had invested the money of the state in wild speculation, oil and mining stocks, and personal securities of doubtful value. He had disobeyed the law, and even if he had turned over every cent he owed, I was determined he should no longer hold the office."

And how will the wrecked auditor's office be rebuilt?

"I sent for Warren Bigler, of Wabash, an old-time friend of undoubted character and responsibility," said the governor. "I told him there were times when the call of duty must be obeyed by every right minded citizen. I told him the circumstances. I said, 'I want you to take this office for the unexpired term and I want you to promise that you won't be a candidate at the next election. I want your whole mind free to clean up this office. Do it solely for the interests of the people. You can't do that if you keep pulling the wires for the 'next house.' But you must 'clean house.' Find out exactly how matters stand, and if there is anything else crooked we must make it straight, and the snail must be punished.' And Bigler promised, and I am certain that there will be a clean administration of the auditor's office during his term."
